River Experience:
A Phenomenological Description of Meaningful Experiences on a Wilderness River Journey

by

Marcus Morse
B. Environmental Design, B. Teaching (Hons.)

Submitted in fulfilment of the requirements for the Degree of Doctor of Philosophy
School of Geography and Environmental Studies
University of Tasmania
April 2011
Declaration

This thesis contains no material which has been accepted for a degree or diploma by the University or any other institution, except by way of background information and duly acknowledged in the thesis, and to the best of the candidate's knowledge and belief no material previously published or written by another person except where due acknowledgement is made in the text of the thesis, nor does the thesis contain any material that infringes copyright.

Marcus Morse.
Date: 14\textsuperscript{th} of April 2011

Statement of Authority of Access

This thesis may be made available for loan and limited copying in accordance with the Copyright Act 1968.

Marcus Morse.
Date: 14\textsuperscript{th} of April 2011
Abstract

Outdoor educators, nature-based tourism guides and private recreationalists make use of wilderness river areas for extended journeys. The justification for running such trips commonly involves the potential ‘experience’ that it affords participants. Yet the experiences themselves are often unique, individual and difficult to describe. While ‘the experience’ is commonly used as a justification for such journeys, experience itself does not always appear to be well understood or easily articulated.

This research project explores participant descriptions of meaningful experiences on a wilderness river journey, in order to answer the questions ‘what forms of meaningful experiences might occur on a wilderness river journey?’, ‘what components of the journey facilitate those meaningful experiences?’, ‘what is the role of the wilderness landscape itself in facilitating those experiences?’, and ‘what is the potential value of meaningful wilderness experiences subsequent upon returning to everyday life?’. The research uses a phenomenological approach to elucidate individual perceptions of meaningful experiences, and then combines the recollections to reveal the commonalities within those experiences. Using interviews, journals, observations and follow-up emails from 32 participants on eight Franklin River (ten day) trips, the project moves from the individual to the collective, to identify and describe the qualities and essences of meaningful experiences on a wilderness river journey.

The research identifies two recurrent key ‘streams of experience’. These involve a feeling of humility and being alive to the present. By interrogating the thematic structure of participant descriptions surrounding these two streams of experience, invariant structures are revealed. These invariant structures further provide the opportunity to refocus on individual participant descriptions, and illuminate the essential qualities of the phenomena described.

It is argued that by understanding potentially meaningful experiences on a wilderness river journey, outdoor educators, commercial guides and facilitators will be better able to make use of surrounding environs to facilitate such experiences. There is a focus on the unique elements of the wilderness river journey that, in this research, contributed to the unique experiences which participants valued as meaningful.
Acknowledgements

This research project has proven more difficult than I had, at the outset, innocently imagined. It has caused me to ask questions not only of my own understanding and experience of wilderness river journeys, but also of myself. Without the encouragement and support of those around me, this would not have been possible.

I owe most to my partner Pip, whose belief, realism, encouragement, support, humour and love throughout provided me the opportunity to undertake this journey. There is no one with whom I would rather be on the river. Immeasurable thanks also to my supervisor, Dr Peter Hay, for the gifts of supervision, encouragement, belief and friendship throughout, and an appreciation of times both on and off the river.

To my family, who have always encouraged me to do all that I could, a lifetime of gratitude. And to my friends, many thanks for the times ‘researching’ rivers, offers to write ‘chapter 14’ and assisting me to get into the ‘rhythm’ of writing. There are too many to mention, but on the off chance that you do pick up this thesis, know that I am indebted to you for your support and friendship.

Thanks also to the staff and post-grad students within the School of Geography and Environmental Studies, a wonderful group of people committed to inquiry and learning. And to the staff within the School of Education, who enabled me to finish this thesis in a timely manner and good humour.

Finally, thanks to the research participants. Without your time, support, interest and insightful recollections of your river experiences this project would certainly have been impossible. You did not need to go out of your way to contribute, but you did. I very much value the conversations and discussions in which we both tried to better understand our meaningful and memorable river experiences.
Table of Contents

Abstract ......................................................................................................................iii

Acknowledgements .....................................................................................................v

Chapter 1 – Introduction ...........................................................................................1

1.1 Understanding the Wilderness Experience...............................................................1

1.2 The Research Questions and Objectives ..................................................................3

1.3 Methodological Considerations .............................................................................4

1.4 Chapter Outlines ....................................................................................................4

Chapter 2 – Literature Review ..................................................................................7

2.1 Introduction ............................................................................................................7

2.2 Wilderness .............................................................................................................7

2.2.1 Origins and Development of the term “Wilderness” ........................................9

2.2.2 Changing Conceptions of Wilderness: Prehistoric to Agricultural ...............11

2.2.3 Wilderness: A Widening Gap ....................................................................13

2.2.4 Searching for Renewed Connection ..........................................................16

2.2.5 Wilderness Preservation ............................................................................19

2.3 The Nature of Experience ....................................................................................20

2.3.1 Experience as Personal ..............................................................................22

2.3.2 Experience as Mediated .............................................................................22

2.3.3 Experience as Interactive ...........................................................................23

2.3.4 Experiences as Lived Through ..................................................................24

2.3.5 Experience as Qualitative ..........................................................................25

2.3.6 Experience as Meaningful .........................................................................26

2.4 Understanding Potentially Meaningful Experiences of Wilderness .....................27

2.4.1 The Romantic Sublime ..............................................................................28

2.4.2 Mysticism ..................................................................................................31

2.4.3 Spiritual and Transcendent experiences ....................................................33

2.4.4 Peak and Plateau Experiences ..................................................................35

2.4.5 Flow ...........................................................................................................38

2.4.6 Preference for Nature ..............................................................................41

2.4.7 Attention Restoration Theory ..................................................................45

2.4.8 Sense of Place ............................................................................................46

2.4.9 Experiencing the Sacred and the Idea of Pilgrimage ..................................49

2.4.10 Wilderness Experience as a Social and Cultural Construction ...............52

2.4.11 Commonalities within Understandings of Meaningful Wilderness Experiences ........................................................................................................54

2.5 Summary of Chapter ............................................................................................55

Chapter 3 – Methodology ........................................................................................56

3.1 Introduction ..........................................................................................................56

3.2 The Research Questions .......................................................................................56

3.2.1 The Study of Human Phenomena, and Alternatives to a Positivist Paradigm ...........................................................................................................57

3.2.2 Procedural Parameters ...............................................................................59

3.3 The Researcher .....................................................................................................60

3.3.1 My Background ........................................................................................60

3.3.2 The Meaning of my River Experiences .....................................................62
Chapter 8 – Discussion of Results..............................................................................204

8.1 Introduction ....................................................................................................204
8.2 How the Results Sit Within Existing Understandings of Meaningful Experiences in Wilderness Environments ..........................................................204
  8.2.1 Neo-Romantic? ........................................................................................205
  8.2.2 Spiritual / Transcendent ...........................................................................208
  8.2.3 The Simultaneous Perception of the Sacred and the Ordinary .................209
  8.2.4 ‘Flow’ and the Interaction with the Surrounding Environment ...............211
  8.2.5 Preference for Connection to Nature .......................................................212
  8.2.6 The Potentially Restorative Nature of the Journey ..................................214
  8.2.7 Sense of Place, and Approaching the Interaction ....................................215
  8.2.8 Wilderness Experience as a Social and Cultural Construction ...............219
  8.2.9 Insights Gained ........................................................................................221

8.3 Elements of the Franklin River Journey that Appeared to Contribute to the Meaningful Experiences Described ......................................................................222
  8.3.1 The Journey .............................................................................................222
    8.3.1.1 Leaving the Everyday World Behind ...............................................222
    8.3.1.2 The Length of the Journey ................................................................223
    8.3.1.3 Commitment to the Journey / Loss of Control ..................................224
  8.3.2 Signposts to Something Larger ................................................................225
    8.3.2.1 The Geology .....................................................................................225
    8.3.2.2 The River Itself .................................................................................225
    8.3.2.3 The Forests .......................................................................................226
    8.3.2.4 Waterfalls and Micro-worlds ............................................................227
  8.3.3 Travelling on the River ............................................................................227
    8.3.3.1 Constantly Connected .......................................................................227
    8.3.3.2 Enclosed Within ...............................................................................228
    8.3.3.3 Unique Views and Enticing Possibilities .........................................228
  8.3.4 River Travel .............................................................................................230
    8.3.4.1 A Sense of Adventure .......................................................................230
    8.3.4.2 Simplicity .........................................................................................232
    8.3.4.3 Rhythm .............................................................................................232
  8.3.5 The Social Space .....................................................................................233
    8.3.5.1 Key Aspects of the Social Context of a Franklin River Journey ......234
    8.3.5.2 The Guides .......................................................................................235
    8.3.5.3 Solitude .............................................................................................236

8.4 The Value of Such Experiences .....................................................................236
  8.4.1 Freedom from Distractions ......................................................................237
  8.4.2 Transcending the “Profane” ....................................................................238
    8.4.2.1 A Moment for Pause .......................................................................239
    8.4.2.2 Questioning Oneself .........................................................................240
    8.4.2.3 An Interweaving with the World ......................................................240
    8.4.2.4 A Sense of Perspective .....................................................................242
    8.4.2.5 A Sense of Humility .........................................................................244
    8.4.2.6 A Renewed Wonder at the World ....................................................245
  8.4.3 Acknowledging the Perceptual Realm of Experience ................................246

8.5 Summary of the Chapter .................................................................................248
Chapter 9 – Limitations, Implications and Future Directions for Research

9.1 Introduction

9.2 Limitations of the Research

9.2.1 Limitations for Generalisability

9.2.2 Reflexivity and Subjectivity

9.2.3 Authenticity of Responses

9.2.4 Particularity

9.2.5 Triangulation and Depth

9.2.6 Quality and Credibility of Inquiry

9.3 Practical Implications of the Research

9.4 Theoretical Implications

9.5 Future Directions for Research

9.6 Summary of Chapter

Chapter 10 – Thesis Summary

References

Appendices

Appendix 1: Introductory Letter

Appendix 2: Consent Form

Appendix 3: Journal Guide

Appendix 4: Interview Guide

Appendix 5: Email Follow up (4 month)

Appendix 6: Email Follow up (12 month)

Appendix 7: Example of coding in NVivo 8

Appendix 8: Examples of an Individual Concept Map

Appendix 9: Thematic Relationship Matrix (fold out)

Appendix 10: Images of the Franklin River