

13 Gore Street, Sydney.
Melbourne 14 October 1878

My dear Andrew,

On this day 3 notable events occurred—An unfortunate individual attained his 29th Summer; he unexpectedly ascertained that the object of his steadily increasing and unwavering affection was residing within half an hour's journey, and lastly, but by no means least, had half a minute ago perused a letter from one of the best friends and one of the most earnest minded ~~men~~ that a man could wish to possess.
I cannot sufficiently express my gratitude for your thoughtful kindness and disinterested affection & for this and many other reasons I shall always recall this day with pardonable pride & joy it however greatly tempered with sorrowful regret for I cannot, for even one moment, conceal from myself that for my true and indeed only course of action it to say that I do not think I ought to accept your proposal. The reasons for such ~~a~~ course are numerous but none the less cogent and I feel I ought to preface them with a warning, a warning to you.
Dear Friend! you are too sanguine & too impetuous—I have watched your career of ~~progress~~ progress with an affectionate anxiety—nothing has escaped me & the news I have to night read of your impending Elevation is to me no surprise—But, Andrew, think well—Are you premature; are you ready; what would be the result of immature greatness? You know well that I am one who always advocate attractive boldness of action &

I feel I am not writing 'vacant chaff well meant for grain' when I tell you that an instinct (I cannot call it else) an instinct that, when the welfare of my friends is the issue, had never misled me, felt bids me counsel prudence, - aye, even delay.
You have ~~me~~^{so} happy a mixture of native good sense and of enthusiasm that I am sure you will see the force of what I mention & I write the opinion of more than one well wisher "The Chauce " will never come again," you may reply but I am sure you will admit on reflection that this is not the case. I feel I am discharging a duty in giving this friendly warning & admonition that you will do what is right. I am so far removed from the scene of action & the arena of the conflict that I cannot go into minutiae or point out the Arguments that might be urged in favor of a policy of delay but I am sure you give them your earnest consideration I bear in mind the ordinary head ' outlookers see most of the same in. Of course there is some for us to renew the subject and if you can't subvert my belief, who will be happier than I?

But Reason! so you offer thy reasons, or the principal of them, for thinking I ought to refuse Are these? I'm sure you'll admit that since I am no longer young & although I devote myself with passionate ardor to my profession it is because I have lost all enthusiasm for aught else. I seek in it a refuge from thought & care & only strive to drug my memory. I am moody & miserable - I am unsoberable I detest society & scarcely conceal contempt for those I dislike or despise. How could such a man adopt a policy of conciliation; how could he attract or retain a Cherifele? The result would be unsatisfactory to both sides - But, in addition, I am desperately in love & distracted with hopes & fears & it may be long before the doubtful question is decided - I cannot wrench myself, even if I wished, away from the enchanted spot and, oh dear Andrew, I feel so worn & worn with the struggle, so tired of the poor "riddle of the painful earth" that I feel I could fall on some faithful breast & sobbing out my prayers set up mine everlasting wail "Forgive these wild & wandering airs" but I have much to endure & it is very hard to suffer & be silent - Ah me, let me return to prose - My third reason is that even if the difficulties I have mentioned, which to me are seemingly insuperable, the greatest has yet to come & which ^{it is one} in the warmth of your affection you have overlooked ^{It is this!} I have by dint of at least 14 years incessant work got into a moderately good position here. But at what a cost! I have unlearned all my Tasmanian local lore & acquired a doctrian stock in its place were I to accede to your proposal & take a partnership what would be the result - For 6 months at least I should be practically useless & you must reflect that this is a serious matter - Add to these reasons that I am saturated with materialism, indifferent to the praises of the world and you behold a model partner!

Putting it on this ground alone, ought you, in justice to yourself & to those who are near & dear to you, entrust the future of your business, perhaps of your life, to such an individual individual. Emphatically no! But believe me I write in sorrow & with a pure conscience; I have laid bare my heart to you & I swear to you know now that I write unreservedly

I faithfully & I tremble without thought or Comment the reference to pecuniary matters - Had I received such a letter as this I would attributed it to a bilious temperament or a disordered liver but I have written it at no time have I been so worthy of your regard as I am now - I receive your letter at once that you may discern the emotions that agitate me & judge at leisure what value there is to be attached to them - Let me hear from you quickly & at length for believe me I am not unwilling to be crowned -

I do not feel inclined - indeed it were hardly proper, to enter on other topics now but I must not quit my kind regards to Mrs Clark & to Winton & Joy - you do not mention their names but I am sure they are memores mei as I of them & you may show them this &c much All you deem proper for from them I wish to have no secrets - I am certain to be over at Christmas & I hope I will find you in the mood in which you last wrote -

I have written fast but the hour grows late - The night is wild & stormy, the wind whistles through the house, rattles & the heat is intrude - and so my ^{heart} ~~heart~~ wild, beloved & arrested, struggling with confusing emotions of love pride, vanity, despair.

But, bah. My stomach must be out of order. Good night. God bless you!

Your affectionate friend
H. Hill

A. Jones Clark Esq
