Travel Journalism, Cosmopolitan Concern and the Place-Branded Environment

by

Lynette McGaурr

School of Social Sciences

Submitted in fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy
University of Tasmania
April 2013
This thesis contains no material which has been accepted for a degree or diploma by the University or any other institution, except by way of background information and duly acknowledged in the thesis, and to the best of my knowledge and belief no material previously published or written by another person except where due acknowledgement is made in the text of the thesis, nor does the thesis contain any material that infringes copyright.

Lynette McGaurr
The following journal articles and forthcoming research book chapter have been integrated into this thesis. The publishers of the journal articles and chapter hold the copyright for that content, and access to the material should be sought from the respective publishers:

—— 2012, “The devil may care: Travel journalism, cosmopolitan concern, politics and the brand”, Journalism Practice, vol. 6, no 1, pp. 42-48.

This thesis may be made available for loan. Copying of unpublished material in the thesis is prohibited for two years from the date this statement was signed. After that time, limited copying is permitted in accordance with the Copyright Act 1968.

Lynette McGaurr
The research associated with this thesis abides by the international and Australian codes of human and animal experimentation, the guidelines by the Australian Government’s Office of the Gene Technology Regulator and the rulings of the Safety, Ethics and Institutional Biosafety Committees of the University.

Lynette McGaurr
Acknowledgements

This thesis would not have been possible without the wisdom, patience, gentle encouragement and sensitive guidance of my supervisor, Libby Lester.

Throughout my candidature I was supported with great care and good humour by my partner and soul mate Russell Fulton. My children Kara, Cameron and Josephine Sibly, parents Jeanette and Darcy McGurr, brother Greg and sister Michelle encouraged me, cooked for me, made me smile and kept my feet on the ground. Sam Boyle’s kindness, empathy and infectious determination helped me through the most difficult times. And my friends Jo Perri, Kathy Chisholm, Phyllis Sibly and Annie Kaczmarski inspired me by their example.

My sincere thanks also to the interviewees who made time available in their very busy lives to participate in this research.
Abstract

The physical environment is a mainstay of the international tourism industry and a component of many place brands. It is also a global asset and, increasingly, a source of conflict and concern. Drawing on a case study of United States and British travel journalism about Australia’s island state of Tasmania, this thesis asks how cosmopolitan concern and place branding interact in the production of travel journalism about tourist destinations experiencing environmental conflict. Rather than concentrating on production in the newsroom, however, its primary interest is what happens in the field. By interviewing travel journalists and actors who have sought to have their messages publicised in overseas newspaper and magazine articles about Tasmania as a holiday destination, the case study weaves together internalist and externalist perspectives. Combining these with textual analyses of travel journalism and other documents, it explores both professional cultures and the evolution and circulation of cosmopolitan and place-branded discourses and frames.

Much international travel journalism mediates commercial tourism for consumers, but it also produces and reflects local identity on the cosmopolitan public stage. The travel media’s reliance on the tourism industry for content and advertising makes it susceptible to reputation management via place branding. This is because government tourism office staff and the sources they recommend are often key contacts for its journalists, whether or not they accept free travel and accommodation. But as this case study reveals, some transnational travel journalists demonstrate cosmopolitan predispositions that can lead them to be reflexive about the way they represent places, and to draw on broader networks for information and opinion.
This thesis finds that place branding shapes consumerist cosmopolitan discourses in ways that appeal to transnational travel journalists and are consistent with the commercial constraints of the travel media, thereby contributing to the circulation abroad of representations that depoliticise landscapes contested in the news media. Associated with this, travel journalists reporting on nature-based destinations sometimes build narrative strength by mediating forms of cosmopolitan concern for the environment that are consistent with place branding. This, in turn, positions readers as members of imagined cosmopolitan communities, enhances the journalist’s cultural capital and functions textually to frame destinations, the tourism industry and the travel media as environmentally responsible. If governments lose control over nature-based brands during periods of environmental conflict, however, travel media institutions may see value to their own brands in calling places to account. This presents travel journalists and sources with interest-group sympathies an opportunity to contribute alternative, politically charged meanings and symbols to international flows of cosmopolitan concern.
Contents

Abstract .......................................................................................................................... vii

Chapter 1: Introduction ................................................................................................. 1

1.1 Gaps in Existing Research .................................................................................. 3
1.2 Rationale ................................................................................................................. 5
1.3 Aim and Scope ......................................................................................................... 13
1.4 Associated Theoretical Interests ......................................................................... 16
  1.4.1 The Public Sphere ......................................................................................... 16
  1.4.2 Source–Media Relations ............................................................................. 19
  1.4.3 The Network Society ..................................................................................... 23
1.5 Case Study Methods .............................................................................................. 25
1.6 Background to the Case Study ............................................................................. 28
1.7 Structure of the Thesis ......................................................................................... 33

PART 1: LITERATURE REVIEW AND APPROACH ................................................... 39

Chapter 2: Travel Journalism ......................................................................................... 41

2.1 Introduction ............................................................................................................. 41
2.2 A Brief History of Travel Texts in Newspapers and Magazines ....................... 43
2.3 Blurred Boundaries ............................................................................................... 48
2.4 The Ubiquity of Free Travel and Accommodation ............................................. 54
2.5 A Working Definition .............................................................................................. 60
2.6 Journalism and Public Relations: Cooperation or Contestation? ..................... 62
2.7 Government Public Relations and Travel Journalism ........................................ 68
2.8 Conclusion .............................................................................................................. 74

Chapter 3: Brands and Place Branding ...................................................................... 75

3.1 Introduction ............................................................................................................. 75
3.2 What is Place Branding? ....................................................................................... 77
3.3 Brand Production and Consumption .................................................................. 79
3.4 Place Branding, Tourism and Public Diplomacy ................................................. 83
3.5 Place Branding and the Environment .................................................................. 88
3.6 Place Branding and the Media ............................................................................. 90
3.7 Public Relations, Politics, Travel Journalism and the Brand ............................... 92
3.8 The Interface between Places and Flows .............................................................. 98
3.9 Conclusion .............................................................................................................. 100
7.5 The Power of Elite Networks ................................................................. 224
  7.5.1 Networks and Professional Judgement ............................................. 225
  7.5.2 Making a Mark .............................................................................. 236
  7.6 Conclusion......................................................................................... 247

Chapter 8: The Travel Media .................................................................... 249
  8.1 Introduction ....................................................................................... 249
  8.2 Holding Destinations to Account ...................................................... 253
  8.3 Circulating Concerns through Brand Extensions ................................ 260
  8.4 The Brand Value of Brands ............................................................... 271
  8.5 Conclusion......................................................................................... 288

Chapter 9: The Challengers ...................................................................... 291
  9.1 Introduction ....................................................................................... 291
  9.2 The View from the Other Side ........................................................... 292
  9.3 Tactical Travel Journalism ................................................................. 299
    9.3.1 The Legacy of the Styx ................................................................. 301
    9.3.2 Under the Radar in the Tarkine .................................................. 307
  9.4 Conclusion......................................................................................... 316

PART 3: CONCLUSION ............................................................................. 323

Chapter 10: Travel Journalism and the Cosmopolitan Public Sphere .......... 325
  10.1 Introduction ..................................................................................... 325
  10.2 Research Conclusions ..................................................................... 327
    10.2.1 Associated Research Questions ............................................... 329
  10.3 Reflections on Research Design ...................................................... 339
  10.4 Suggestions for Further Research .................................................. 340

REFERENCES ......................................................................................... 343

APPENDIX 1: British and United States Travel Journalists Interviewed ....... 377
APPENDIX 2: Other Interviewees ............................................................. 379
APPENDIX 3: Articles by Interviewed Travel Journalists .......................... 381
APPENDIX 4: Articles Including the Bay of Fires ...................................... 383
APPENDIX 5: New York Times Articles ................................................ 385